Q+A WITH DAVID KRYNAUW

Joint winner of the professional category of the 2009 Eskom Energy Efficient Lighting Design Competition, David wowed judges with his finely crafted Pendant chandelier (see page 122 of our February issue).

Describe your design. These shades are individually turned on a lathe from jacaranda stumps and then arranged together. Why did you choose wood? With wood every product turns out differently. Where did you get the design idea from? Modern light fittings tend to appear clinical – using wood in combination with state-of-the-art light sources could overcome this trend. In what way is it ecofriendly? In my operation, nothing is wasted. Offcuts and sawdust are used as mulch, and in compost for growing organic vegetables and fruit. I'm proud to have an overall negative carbon footprint. What has winning the award meant for you? Receiving recognition from experts in the industry was the ultimate prize for me. What are you working on now? Recent products include tables, solid counter tops and interesting kitchen work stations. I'm also looking at how to incorporate wood into standing lamps.

GAS GUZZLERS NO MORE

Land Rover has been investing in sustainable technology, and one of the first recipients is the Freelander 2. It's the first SUV to feature the new Stop/ Start system technology, which significantly improves fuel consumption in heavy traffic conditions. The system comes standard on all manual diesel models.

BRICK BY BRICK

Corobrik was the first SA company to be awarded carbon credits (its kilns burn natural gas rather than coal). Clay face bricks release no volatile gases, plus they're recyclable and they moderate temperatures. corobrik.co.za
